1. The professor provided two videos, one on his Windows laptop, and the other using a Windows laptop to demonstrate X2go running on Computer Science Department hardware. Was it useful to see the process demonstrated in either of these environments?
2. What elements of the development environment were you confused about that these videos helped to clarify?
3. Are there elements of the development environment that you are still confused about that the videos did not shed any light on? If so, which ones, and what kind of changes would make the videos more helpful?
